DCI Managment Advisory Group

SUBJECT:

Agency Newsletter

- 1. CIA employees, in a vigorous response to the DCI Management Advisory Group's recent all-employee questionnaire, have expressed a strong interest in initiating an Agency-wide newsletter. According to their many comments, such a newsletter should be classified, substantial, and brief, linking employees more closely by dealing with a wide variety of subjects and issues of common Agency concern.
- 2. DCI/MAG supports the survey's results, but recognizes that the concept requires further study. Not only does the size, content and format of such a newsletter deserve careful consideration, but also the question of resources--requisite staffing, budget, and office space.
- 3. Office of Personnel's newsletter, "News and Views," already being distributed (around copies) throughout the Agency, seems to have the potential for expanding into an Agency-wide newsletter, located either in the Directorate of Administration or in the Office of the DCI. DCI/MAG has been informed that a capable full-time staff of two could handle the job. Further study and specific recommendations, however, are necessary.
- 4. We therefore propose that the Executive Committee convene a task force to study the question of an Agency-wide newsletter and arrive at specific recommendations regarding its mandate, staffing, and location, as well as its budget, format, and size.

SUBJECT:

Report on Agency Newsletter

- 1. CIA employees, in a vigorous response to DCI/MAG's recent questionnaire, voiced a strong preference for introducing an Agency-wide newsletter.
- 2. The questionnaire (Attachment A) was destributed in early September to all employees. Of the more than ______ employees who responded, more than 83% favored such a newsletter. Somewhat fewer (about 73%), but still a strong majority, expressed an interest in a "special edition" for their own Directorates added to a core Agency-wide newsletter. Those polled preferred paper over online publication, by approximately 75% to 23%.
- 3. The kind of newsletter Agency employees have in mind (according to the large number of comments received) would be classified, substantial, and brief. It would deal with a wide variety of subjects and issues of common Agency concern and link Agency employees more closely. Employees showed a strong interest in the entire organization: many wrote that, although voting in favor of a special edition for their own Directorate, they did not want to miss out on other Directorates' special editions. Others voted against special editions because they did not want to foster further "parochialism."
- 4. Behind this response seems to lie a real need for better communications—top—down and between the Directorates, as well as between Headquarters and the various outbuildings. Many employees commented that although they are swimming in bulletins and notices, this information often arrives too late to be useful and does not really fill the communications gap. The comments indicate that many managers are not communicating satisfactorily with subordinates, many individual employees have no idea of how they fit into the Agency as a whole, and entire offices feel cast adrift from Headquarters.

5. It is important to note that not everyone favors an Agency newsletter. Some of those opposed are concerned about possible security breaches. Far more, however, do not want to waste the Agency's money and employees' time. Even among those favoring a newsletter, many warned that a publication filled with "fluff," pep talks, and the "party line" would be degrading to the employee as well as a waste of precious resources. Conversely, one of the newsletter's major selling points was the hope that it might consolidate many of the communications now circulating independently, thus cutting down the flood of paper presently inundating employees.

- 6. There are some interesting differences in responses between the Directorates. Of all the Directorates, DS&T (87%) and DA (87%) were the most enthusiastic about an Agency newsletter, with DO, at 78%, the least enthused. DS&T (77%) and DA (76%) were also the strongest supporters of special Directorate editions, while O/DCI (72%) was the least. DI (38%) had the most interest in an online publication (DA, at 22% was next), while O/DCI (85%) and DS&T (84%) most heavily favored paper publication. (All of the above figures are rounded to the nearest integer).
- 7. The numerous comments returned with the questionnaires indicated some pervasive Agency and Directorate problems. A newsletter, of course, would not solve these problems. But, if well done, it could make a start at alleviating some of them.
- 8. I have attached a blank copy of the actual questionnaire (Attachment A). I have also attached the survey data (Attachment B), a selection of comments received (Attachment C), and a list of employee suggestions for what might be included in a newsletter (Attachment D).

communications and morale tend to restrict their distribution to within a given office, where news, whether of promotions, awards, or family milestones, promotes the image of the "office family." OIR, interestingly, accomplishes both objectives by publishing two newsletters—an external one, publicizing new OIR services and products, and an internal one (more chatty and informal) to inform OIR staff of projects in progress. OIT soon will be doing the same.

- 5. Those working on newsletters seem to love newsletters, and so it was not particularly surprising to find that many I talked with think there is a great need for an Agency-wide newsletter (or at least Directorate-wide ones, especially for DI). Some, however, were concerned that an Agency-wide newsletter might supplant their own particular newsletters, and this tempered their enthusiasm.
- 6. Lee Strickland (C/MSD/OIT), who is currently developing both internal and external newsletters for OIT, has doubts about an Agency-wide newsletter. The problem he sees is that any composite-type newsletter, based on items solicited from each Agency office, would by necessity be quite shallow. He did, however, think that a newsletter containing an Agency-wide calendar of events and a focus on the DCI (budgets, Congressional affairs, DCI staff meetings) and the Intelligence Community as well as on personnel issues might be useful.
- 7. Of possible interest: There is a Design and Presentation office at Headquarters (ground floor) which can set up the basics for a newsletter, including layout, logo and graphics. P&PD can do the rest, including distribution.
